Description

Magnificent Victorian-era earrings, dating from the 1860s-1870s. These exquisite 14-karat gold earrings reflect the finest in British craftsmanship. Each piece is unique and showcases the splendor of the Anglo-Indian and Mughal styles of the British Raj. These earrings feature an antique cut, with a white "rose-cut" diamond serving as the center stone, untreated. They are a timeless addition to your collection. Thanks to their handcrafted construction and the use of untreated natural gemstones, these earrings, adorned with sparkling diamonds, are a true treasure for lovers of high-quality vintage jewelry. The original screw clasps have been replaced with secure snap clasps. They are a beautiful length of approximately 5 cm and have a total weight of about 14 grams. Cultural context: Interest in Indian craftsmanship grew significantly following the 1851 Great Exhibition in London: companies such as P. Orr & Sons in Madras produced hybrid pieces combining European forms with Hindu and Islamic motifs for the Western market.

Traditional Indian forms were adapted to the Victorian era, often combined with elements such as old-cut diamonds or enamel work. It is precisely this combination that is unique to this period and exerts a timeless fascination.
