Description

Early 18th-century blue-and-white Delft earthenware potiche vase. Created in the Delft workshops and pottery kilns in the Netherlands in the early 18th century, this vase is a true museum piece, ideal for a collector! The history of European ceramics is defined by the quest to rival Chinese porcelain. Before the discovery of kaolin--the secret ingredient in porcelain production--ceramics took the form of earthenware with a rough, unrefined appearance, as seen here in this potiche vase. Authentic, it echoes the style of Chinese baluster vases, featuring blue on a white background with landscape designs including flowers and birds. As it is an antique, this vase shows signs of wear from age, with cracks, slight chips, and scuffs remaining, attesting to its age and authenticity.
