Description

Philibert Cockx (1879-1949) offers here a highly personal interpretation of the rural landscape, in which the simplification of forms and the contrasts of light take precedence over a faithful depiction of reality. The bell tower, farmhouses, and clusters of trees are rendered as broad, dark swaths that stand out against a luminous, almost unreal sky, creating a quiet and contemplative atmosphere. The deep greens of the meadow, the ochres of the buildings, and the blacks of the plant silhouettes reflect a deliberately limited yet highly intense color palette.The work reveals the influence of Belgian Post-Impressionist and Expressionist movements, from which Cockx draws inspiration for his preference for synthetic compositions and harmonious color schemes. The paint, generously applied with a palette knife and
