Description

Glazed ceramic and plaster. An adhesive label identifying the artist is affixed to the bottom of the base. The work belongs to the 1990s-2000s body of work by artist Walter Guidobaldi, known by his artist name Wal, and specifically to the "putti" series--sculptures in the round made of marble, bronze, resin, or terracotta--whether monumental or small in scale--in which the protagonists are mischievous cherubs engaged in games of dexterity. Starting in the 1980s, Wal joined the ranks of the "Nuovi-nuovi," artists characterized by a playful lightness--almost worthy of Palazzeschi--and by a revival of color, imagery, and craftsmanship, thus reacting against the overly "cold," intellectualist climate that had taken hold in the 1970s around the aesthetics of so-called "conceptual" art.
