Description

An elegant antique leather rifle case dating from the early 20th century, around 1900, originally designed for storing and transporting a hunting rifle. The case has a long, slender profile and is crafted from leather, reflecting the traditional craftsmanship associated with high-end hunting and shooting accessories of the era. It was designed to protect the firearm during travel to hunting grounds. Over time, the leather has developed a beautiful natural patina, with signs of age and wear lending the piece authenticity and character. These leather rifle cases were an indispensable accessory of European sporting culture at the turn of the century and were particularly associated with rural estates, hunting parties, and traditional shooting equipment. Today, this case is just as appealing as
