Description

Pair of 19th-Century Victorian Oak Gothic Revival Armchairs *Attributed to James Schoolbred & Co - English, circa 1860*A beautifully proportioned pair of Victorian oak Gothic Revival open armchairs, very much in the style of James Schoolbred & Co, combining striking architectural detail with the comfort and charm of a country house. Each chair is constructed of solid oak with chamfered edges; the frames display a rich grain, warm color, and a mellow, well-aged patina. The deep, square, padded backs, with generously padded armrests, are supported by elegant, tapering fluted uprights. A sprung, upholstered seat provides excellent comfort and depth, making these chairs ideal for reading or relaxed seating. The front legs feature a classic Gothic design, with finely carved trefoil

Gothic tracery brackets and fluted, turned legs joined by an H-shaped crossbar. The chairs stand on their original brass casters, a further mark of quality. In wonderful original condition, the frames have been fully restored and repolished, and still retain the original horsehair upholstery beneath the current coverings. They are ready to be reupholstered in a fabric of your choice, offering the opportunity to tailor them perfectly to your interior. Seat height is a comfortable 40 cm. Highly decorative yet sturdy and functional, this handsome pair would look stunning in a hallway, library, sitting room, or study, where they will offer both comfort and a striking visual presence. A very high-quality pair of English country house armchairs with deep seats, high backs, and timeless Gothic Revival character, equally at home in a traditional or a more contemporary setting.
