Description

Bound in domino-patterned paper, this is a New Year's almanac that would later be called an illustrated calendar. It falls into the category of "ephemera," a term used to describe objects intended to disappear fairly quickly because they become obsolete rapidly and are never produced with durability or high quality in mind. This almanac contains a wealth of practical information of all kinds, such as tide tables, the clergy, and the judiciary, while also covering information about various institutions ranging from embassies and museums to royal courts without forgetting some of the maps to unfold.
