Description

Renaissance-inspired wall-mounted console table in polychrome earthenware, decorated with a satyr's head in high relief, volutes, floral motifs, a seashell, and a small wooded landscape. An apocryphal inscription reading "faict a Rouen 1647," accompanied by a fleur-de-lis on the reverse, echoes the older 17th-century inscriptions. As early as the 16th century, Rouen was an important center for the production of majolica and decorative earthenware. Having undergone significant development throughout the Renaissance, it reached its golden age in the 17th and early 18th centuries. It is characterized by elaborate, richly polychromatic designs that evolved in step with changing artistic trends. Production was highly varied, ranging from tableware to utilitarian objects, including busts,
