effect. But this is only to be expected, as Faugeron was a great French painter of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, first and foremost recognized for his large-scale genre compositions, which he submitted to all the Parisian Salons--a practice that earned him numerous awards. Adolphe Faugeron exhibited regularly at the Paris Salon, of which he became a member in 1883, winning numerous prizes (including a medal of honor in 1907 and another in 1911).Today, his works can be found in numerous museums, including the Musée d'Orsay in Paris.But aside from these large, lively compositions--which brought him fame and fetched excellent prices at auction--Faugeron was also an excellent landscape painter, as evidenced by this small landscape and many others he created throughout France.
