Description

A large two-panel wrought-iron interior grille, made around 1940-1950 in a Neo-Rococo style inspired by 18th-century decorative motifs. The particularly rich composition is arranged symmetrically around an abundant decoration of volutes, scrolls, foliage, and floral motifs. The various decorative elements are crafted from wrought iron and sheet metal that has been worked, cut, and shaped, notably featuring beautiful hanging motifs in the shape of flowers or bellflowers. The piece was originally enhanced with gilded highlights, still visible in places on the foliage and certain ornaments. The gate has been partially stripped, revealing today an interesting interplay between the weathered brown iron and the remnants of the original gilding. Mounted on two hinged panels, it retains
