Description

Charming Early 19th-Century Oak Country House Dresser with Plate Rack This charming early 19th-century oak kitchen dresser, circa 1820, is a beautiful example of English country house furniture, combining generous storage with a striking visual presence. Crafted from solid oak with a rich golden tone, it displays a lovely grain and superb patina throughout. The original boarded plate rack features three horizontal shelves with raised edges to securely hold plates, framed by a molded cornice and straight frieze. The upper section offers open shelving flanked by small enclosed cupboards on either side of the central shelves, with rounded side columns and paneled ends adding to its country elegance. The base provides excellent, practical storage: a total of six drawers--two top drawers above four graduated central drawers--flanked by a cupboard on each side, again featuring rounded side columns and paneled ends. All drawers are fitted with brass handles, which are later, sympathetic replacements. Retaining its original back and floorboards and standing on its original breakfront plinth base, this dresser boasts an outstanding, untouched color and patina. The molded, paneled oak sides with traditional pinned construction reflect the quality Georgian craftsmanship of the period. Equally at home in a classic country kitchen or a more contemporary interior, this large dresser is a true eye-catcher thanks to its impressive proportions, beautiful tones, and characterful surface. More than just a functional piece of furniture, it is a fine testament to the enduring quality and charm of early 19th-century English country house craftsmanship.
