Description

A significant and authentic oak balustrade dating from the late 17th or early 18th century, from the Louis XIV period. Measuring a remarkable 205 cm in length, it consists of ten robust turned balusters arranged between a molded lower rail and a substantial handrail. Each baluster features a rhythmic profile of pear-shaped forms, spheres, rings, and projections, creating a particularly decorative sequence. The vigor of the turning, the generous proportions, and the strong architectural presence of the whole are characteristic of interior design from the Louis XIV period. The antique oak displays a beautiful, warm, deep, and nuanced patina. The variations in color and the natural wear on certain parts reinforce the authentic character of this architectural element, which is over three centuries old. The balustrade has been deliberately preserved in its original condition. It shows signs of wear, erosion, past damage from wood-boring insects, small gaps, and imperfections, particularly at the ends and on the top and bottom rails. These signs of wear are clearly visible in the photographs and contribute to its charm and the aesthetic of an old house. With its dimensions and the harmonious repetition of its ten balusters, it is a remarkable decorative element. It could be reused as a room divider, a bookcase front, a piece of wood paneling, a mezzanine feature, or a railing, provided it is adapted and reinforced by a professional.
