Description

Rare low paravan for a living room or alcove from the period Louis XV style, consisting of five panels of molded walnut and adorned with its remarkable antique wallpaper featuring an exotic design. Each panel features a dynamic upper section shaped like a gendarme's cap. The side panels, joined by their original bronze hinges, have retained a beautiful, warm patina. An interesting feature is that the five panels covered with wallpaper can slide vertically within their frames. The design, applied to canvas mounted on a stretcher, features a refined composition of flowers and birds in the "Indiennes" style, which was particularly popular in the 18th century. Despite visible tears, wear, and gaps, this precious antique decoration retains its beautiful colors. It stands as a rare testament to the Enlightenment's fascination with exotic and naturalistic motifs. The folding screen is fully functional. Its unusual proportions allow it to discreetly divide a space, enclose an alcove, or conceal part of a room, while also serving as a remarkable decorative element. An authentic and particularly rare piece, sought after for its elegant Louis XV woodwork, its ingenious system of movable panels, and the preservation of its antique painted decoration. Condition: good condition for its age. Tears, wear, and missing sections of wallpaper, consistent with its age and visible in the photographs. Very beautiful patina on the walnut. Original hinges. The sliding mechanism functions properly. Its low height is not a drawback: it suits its specific function as a fireplace, living room, or alcove screen. Its main features are the five panels, the Louis XV-style walnut woodwork, the sliding panels, and, above all, the well-preserved original bird motif.
