Description

? HISTORY & DESIGNExecutive office chair with armrests, designed by Charles Pollock for Knoll International, United States, third quarter of the 20th century.Designed in 1963, this model represents one of the most accomplished designs in modernist executive seating. The technical design relies entirely on a chrome-plated, extruded aluminum rim that encircles the shell along its perimeter: it simultaneously provides structural support, maintains the tension of the upholstery, and serves as the edge finish. The frame is concealed within this single profile, which explains the absence of any visible hardware. This feature is also the model's primary distinguishing characteristic: on authentic pieces, the shell only achieves its rigidity once it is fitted into the band.The outer shell is made of black plastic, with the armrests extending from the rim in a single, continuous curve. The upholstery, shown here in black leather, is button-tufted and rests against the rim without covering it. The four-star base, fitted with glides, corresponds to configurations predating Knoll's transition to five-star bases on casters. This specimen is stationary: it has neither a swivel mechanism nor height adjustment. ? TECHNICAL
