paint. The surface takes on an almost calligraphic character, composed of interrupted marks, scratches and fragmented forms. The work belongs to the most decisively abstract phase of her career. Her daughter, Marion Dillange (1963-2020), was also a painter, working primarily in abstraction and collage, suggesting an interesting artistic dialogue between the two generations. Francine Chimène lived and worked in Chatou, a town historically associated with the Impressionists and the Île des Impressionnistes. Some online sources give 1933 as her year of birth, while documentation connected with her death indicates that 1929 is the correct date. The work comes from the artist's heirs.
