Giuseppe Migneco, originally from Messina but who moved to Milan at a young age, was one of the leading figures--along with Aligi Sassu, Renato Birolli, Bruno Cassinari, and Renato Guttuso--of the Corrente group, which was open to European artistic avant-gardes. Advocating for socially engaged painting, he examined reality with a critical, objective, and historical eye. His figures, with their hard, angular faces--marked by hard labor and rendered in vivid, strong tones--evoke his native Sicily with its violent and sharp features, as well as the social realism of Mexican muralists. This work features his characteristic
