NegroAntique frame, with defects and missing sections. Painting in good condition, with old restorations; an old surface layer of varnish is present, partially oxidized.This significant still life--of which two other examples may be available --depicts a lush bouquet featuring numerous botanical varieties, rendered with careful sensitivity through a rich application of impasto and tonal variations, arranged within an embossed metal vase resting on a square-shaped base.Given its large size and the fact that it is part of a series, this work was certainly commissioned to decorate a patrician palace: it was, in fact, customary to adorn the most prominent walls in grand reception halls or in the long corridors connecting the various wings of palaces with series of works specially commissioned to suit the tastes of the noble owners. The painting, dating from the late 17th century, exhibits characteristics typical of the Tuscan school and is attributed to the Florentine artist Andrea Scacciati (Florence 1642-1710), a leading figure, alongside Bartolomeo Bimbi, in this genre of painting in Florence during the late Baroque period. Andrea Scacciati is, in fact, considered the driving force behind the Baroque renewal of the Florentine still life in a century that marked the golden age of this figurative genre: during the 17th century, in fact, still life established itself as a genre in its own right, and all its inherent potential--in terms of visual impact, descriptive precision, compositional skill, and symbolic richness--reached an unsurpassed pinnacle. In the late 1660s, the artist established a workshop that received numerous commissions from the ruling house and various noble families. Highly esteemed by the Medici and the most prominent patrician families of Tuscany, he created works of the highest stylistic quality, devoted primarily to floral compositions, rendered with masterful painterly skill and enhanced by unique chromatic effects. His paintings were particularly sought after by Grand Duchess Vittoria della Rovere and Grand Duke Cosimo III and were intended for the Villa dell'Ambrogiana. As for the characteristics of his style, his descriptive approach is marked by an original eclecticism, drawn primarily from his knowledge of 17th-century Flemish and Dutch paintings, as well as from the refinements of the Roman floral compositions by the famous Mario Nuzzi, better known as Mario de' Fiori. The composition's style and the chiseled metal vase are characteristic of the artist's later period. Numerous elements characteristic of the painter are evident in this still life, including the almost geometric balance of the flowers' arrangement and the varied color palette used to depict the different botanical species--rendered with variety and elegance--which are further enhanced by the dark background.
