Description

Cylinder-style desk with a glass-paned upper section, made of mahogany and mahogany veneer, in the Louis XVI style, early 19th century. The upper section consists of two glass-paned doors opening onto a storage space and topped by a white marble top edged with an openwork brass molding. The side panels are adorned with vertical fluting. The cylinder features a veneer with pronounced grain. When opened, it reveals an interior fitted with small drawers and compartments, as well as a drop-down panel serving as a writing desk, lined with an antique dark upholstery. The base section includes three drawers. The piece rests on four tapered legs, finished with brass feet. The lock plates, handles, and trim elements are also made of brass. The desk is preserved in its original
