the carefully executed painted decoration creates a striking visual effect, transforming the tray into a true work of decorative art. These creations, inspired by the classical style, were particularly prized in Italian interiors in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, reflecting a lasting fascination with archaeological discoveries and the artistic heritage of the ancient Mediterranean world.

Terracotta pedestal The tabletop rests on an elegant terracotta pedestal, which was added later and was not part of the original set with the marble tabletop. The warm character and earthy tones of the terracotta offer an appealing contrast to the painted marble surface, enhancing the table's Mediterranean and classical allure. This combination creates a harmonious architectural composition while preserving the distinction between the original tabletop (early 20th century) and its later-added base.

A Striking Decorative Presence With its generous diameter of 120 cm and total height of 70 cm, this table commands a remarkable architectural presence. It would make a spectacular centerpiece in a classic interior, an entryway, a sunroom, a gallery, or a Mediterranean-inspired home. Its circular shape and richly decorated surface also make it an ideal center table to assert a style, combining functional proportions with the character of an exceptional decorative object. A remarkable example of early 20th-century Italian decor inspired by classical motifs, distinguished by its imposing painted marble top, its Greek-inspired ornamental design, and its impressive proportions.
