Description

When a Pattern Comes to LifeThe Turks humorously call this pattern "fishbone." The image immediately comes to mind: elongated, jagged shapes crisscrossed by small lines seem to trace the bones of a particularly geometric fish. In the central field, these shapes shift and echo one another without forming strict symmetry. Yet the overall composition remains very orderly. It is this slight imbalance that gives the design its movement: the surface vibrates, almost as if the pattern were shifting before our eyes. The Pattern and Its OriginThis distinctive composition, combined with the piece's colors, allows connoisseurs to trace the kilim's origins to the Mut region in the Taurus Mountains, in southern Anatolia. The rug is woven wool-on-wool, and its colors indicate the use of plant-based dyes. A vivid and contrasting palette Garnet red and brick red lend warmth to the field. Bright orange enlivens it, while deep purple and nearly black brown enhance the contrast. Ivory brings light; the pale, slightly grayish green introduces a softer note. The alternation of these colors accompanies the shifts in the pattern and accentuates the impression of movement.
