Description

Vintage console table from the 1970s, made of leather-patinated iron with a glass top -- In the style of Jacques Adnet and Hermès designs A remarkable console table from the 1970s, captivating for its architectural elegance, the nobility of its lines, and the sophistication of its finishes. This distinctive decorative piece embodies the spirit of the finest furniture designs inspired by the equestrian world, where metalwork, the evocation of saddle leather, and the refinement of the joinery come together to form a particularly unique aesthetic language.The structure, made entirely of metal, features a patina in warm, subtly nuanced shades of fawn leather, lending the piece a presence that is both exquisite and timeless. The crossbars, delicately crafted and accented with an elegant faux saddle-stitch pattern, reflect a particularly sophisticated approach to design. The dark metal rings, seamlessly integrated into the console's lines, emphasize its geometric design and lend it an almost architectural character.The glass top, with its understated elegance, beautifully highlights the lightness of the base and the richness of its finish. It is in impeccable condition, without a single scratch, offering perfect transparency and a particularly refined appearance.The piece captivates with the balance of its proportions, the quality of its craftsmanship, and the attention paid to even the smallest details. Far from being a mere functional console table, it is a true decorative object, whose aesthetic evokes the refined world of Jacques Adnet and the furniture designs developed around the House of Hermès, with that same sensitivity to materials, the codes of upholstery, and the elegance of metal structures.With its sculptural appearance and understated refinement, this console table will naturally find its place in a discerning contemporary interior, a collector's apartment, or a home with modernist accents. It will complement both a work of art and a selection of precious objects, bringing a touch of sophistication and a strong decorative presence to the space.A rare, striking piece of remarkable elegance, in exceptional condition, intended for connoisseurs of high-quality vintage furniture and for interiors where every element is chosen for its personality, material, and evocative power.
