Description

This late 17th-century landscape captivates with the liveliness of its brushwork and the charm of its scenes of everyday life. At the water's edge, the washerwomen are a particularly delightful detail: their bent silhouettes, their bustling movements, and their clothing accented with red, blue, and white are rendered with small, energetic, and luminous brushstrokes. Just a few brushstrokes are enough to suggest a fabric, a posture, or a reflection, giving these figures a remarkable presence despite their small size. This spontaneity animates the entire composition. The light catches the foliage, highlights the animals' coats, and sparkles on the water's surface. As the eye travels across the landscape, it discovers a multitude of details full of movement. A painting that is both decorative and lively, whose charm
