Description

18th-century Wedgwood Black Basalt vase, predating 1780 This 18th-century black basalt vase, which bears no mark, is attributed to the early period of Wedgwood black basalt production, a refined, fine-grained stoneware developed by Josiah Wedgwood in the 1760s. Its particularly heavy weight, reminiscent of iron, reflects the density of this historic ceramic material and offers insight into the evolution of manufacturing techniques of the time, before the production process was fully perfected. Combining historical significance with the characteristic matte black finish of black basalt pieces, this vase represents an important chapter in the development of English neoclassical ceramics and Wedgwood's pioneering contribution to the decorative arts of
