Description

Pair of textile panels, liturgical ceremonial items, of Ottoman or Mediterranean inspiration (19th century), likely associated with the Jewish tradition (Sephardic) tradition or to the Eastern Churches. In a religious context, they were likely used primarily as ornaments for sacred spaces: decorative curtains framing the Holy Ark (Parochet housing the Torah scrolls), coverings for the reading platform (Bimah), processional banners, or altar frontals. Their iconography carries deep spiritual significance: The peacock at the top symbolizes the immortality of the soul and the resurrection. The tree and the cup represent the Tree of Life (Etz Chaim) and the source of divine wisdom. The crescent and star evoke celestial creation, divine guidance, and the rhythm of the religious calendar.
