Description

A charming French Art Deco wrought iron plant stand dating from the 1920s, featuring an elegant openwork panel depicting a heron standing among stylized bulrushes and reeds. The composition captures the period's fascination with nature interpreted through clean lines and simplified forms, combining decorative appeal with the geometric restraint characteristic of Art Deco design.

The stand is crafted from wrought iron and features a rectangular tray top with a raised edge, ideal for displaying plants, flowers, or decorative objects. The lower panel forms a striking silhouette of a waterside scene, with the graceful heron framed by sweeping reeds and cattails. Scroll feet provide stability while adding a subtle decorative flourish to the overall design.

Layers of old white paint over an earlier green finish have developed an attractive weathered appearance over time. The heavily worn surface, together with areas of oxidation and rust spotting, contributes to the piece's authentic character and rustic charm. These age-related imperfections enhance its appeal as a decorative garden, conservatory, or interior accent.

A distinctive example of French Art Deco metalwork, combining functional design with a stylized naturalistic motif.

Good structural condition with significant age-related wear. Old white paint over an earlier green finish is heavily worn, with visible rust spots, paint loss, surface oxidation, scratches, and patina throughout. The photos form an integral part of the description and condition report of this piece.
