Description

Fragment of a limestone column with a continuous chevron pattern.Typical of Norman architecture, this decorative motif--also known as a herringbone pattern--was used throughout the Romanesque period in architecture.Our column must have been part of a portal or a mullioned window, given its small size and the fact that the back is only roughly hewn, indicating it was attached to a surface that covered its rear side.A small fragment that bears witness to the geometric decorative style of one of the most splendid periods of medieval architecture.Dimensions: 12 x 12 x 20 cm (H)
