Description

A four-piece set made of black basalt stoneware (Black Basalt), made in England in the Wedgwood style, dating from the late 18th or early 19th century. The set includes a lidded teapot, a milk jug, a cream pitcher, and a large bowl. Each piece is decorated with neoclassical relief scenes depicting figures in the classical style, draped female figures, putti, urns, and allegorical compositions. The rims are accented with interlaced geometric friezes, while the lower sections feature a pattern of fine vertical fluting. Basalt stoneware, characterized by its black body and matte finish, underwent significant development in England beginning in the second half of the 18th century, particularly in the Staffordshire potteries. The teapot is 11.5 cm tall; the bowl is 9 cm tall. The set is in very good
