Description

A pair of Art Deco-era drop earrings, crafted in 750/°° white gold (18 KT, eagle-head hallmarks) and platinum (dog-head hallmarks), reflecting the refined aesthetic of antique dormeuse earrings. Each earring features a supple row of diamonds, each set in a delicate closed-bezel setting characteristic of the period. These settings are delicately linked to one another by invisible rings, giving the entire piece remarkable flexibility--particularly sideways--that naturally follows the movements of the head. This succession of diamonds forms a luminous and delicately tapered line, at the end of which hangs a large half-cut diamond, prong-set in an openwork platinum "sun" setting that highlights its size and characteristic brilliance. Freely articulated at the tip of each pendant, these two main diamonds enjoy great mobility, allowing them to capture light with the slightest movement and fully reveal their brilliance. The earrings are mounted on posts for pierced ears, fitted with antique Alpa-style clasps in perfect working order. Particularly secure and discreet, these fasteners are completely concealed once the earrings are worn, revealing only the row of diamonds and the elegance of their design. The combination of white gold and platinum gives the piece an entirely white aesthetic, characteristic of Art Deco jewelry, in which the metal recedes to allow the stones' light to shine. Understated and timeless, these earrings captivate with their delicate craftsmanship, remarkable movement, and the unique charm of their half-cut diamonds. Their slender silhouette, accentuated by the two diamond pendants, delicately frames the face and complements every style and occasion. Estimated total diamond weight: 2.00 carats Gross weight: 5.70 g Condition: imperceptible micro-scratches on the metal parts; natural inclusions in the diamonds not visible to the naked eye.
