Description

Oil on canvas. The landscape--a countryside rich in vegetation, with a mountain range of pointed peaks in the background--is brought to life by the presence of three washerwomen heading to the river with their wheelbarrows full of laundry, while a traveler crosses the small bridge spanning the stream. The work is executed in the style of Antonio Peruzzini (1650-1724), likely by one of his students or followers. Peruzzini was a key figure in 17th- and 18th-century landscape painting, beginning with a 17th-century style and eventually arriving at an interpretation of movement and color typical of the Rococo, using lighter, brighter tones and infusing his paintings with a sense of vitality. Of particular note is his use of color, especially in the rendering of human figures, which are outlined with thick, impasto
