Description

When I first began my journey as a collector, these extraordinary pieces belonged, as far as I was concerned, to the world of books. I discovered them in specialized publications devoted to the art of textiles. The captions indicated that they came from private collections or were housed in one museum or another. I admired them from afar, never imagining that one day we, too, would have the chance to encounter true treasures: pieces as rare and precious as those chosen to illustrate the greatest reference works. For a collector, the transition from admiration to actually seeing a piece in person is a particularly moving experience.A composition that captivates the eyeEverything about this piece is remarkable, starting with the extreme fineness of its weave. But its beauty also lies in the alignment of its horizontal bands, whose patterns are embroidered. Each features a different design, even though certain motifs echo one another, revealing a subtle repetition.The eye thus wanders across the entire surface. It lingers on a detail, catches on a motif, then continues its exploration. As one observes the piece, one comes to appreciate the precision and mastery of the work, which here seem to attain a form of perfection.Chuvals are large carrying bags used by nomadic peoples during their travels. As everyday objects, they belong to a vast family of utilitarian textiles in the creation of which weavers vied with one another in inventiveness and virtuosity. This piece offers a particularly accomplished example of this artistry; it is a true masterpiece.Turkmen Yomud chuvalWool on woolPlant-based dyesCirca 1870Dimensions: 105 × 80 cmCondition: near-miraculous, flawlessChoosing an antique rug or textile is often a matter of serendipity.
