Description

Just this once, let's start with the borders that frame the central field. They feature an ornamental style characteristic of kilims from the Afyon region in Western Anatolia. They feature wolf's mouths--a symbol of protection--as well as stylized wing shapes, which evoke freedom.The motifs appear to interlock with one another. Only the different colors allow them to be distinguished. Their sequence creates a continuous rhythm--both linear and fluid--that guides the eye all around the central field.At the heart of the kilim, a deep madder red highlights the composition. On either side of the central field, a succession of small oblique points, arranged in tight rows, forms a ridge-like pattern and emphasizes the movement of the central section.Three large medallions punctuate this red field. Within each one, the scorpion motif stands out, giving the composition a particularly strong presence.This kilim is woven wool-on-wool. Its weave is very fine and very even. This fineness and evenness are also distinctive features of early productions from the Afyon region. The piece is clearly identifiable and is featured in reference works dedicated to these productions.Daskiri kilim, Afyon region, AnatoliaWoven wool-on-woolPlant-based dyesCirca 1950In perfect conditionDimensions : 240 × 150 cmChoosing an antique rug or textile is often a matter of serendipity.
