Description

16th-century German executioner's swordThese swords served a dual purpose, playing a role in both the judicial process and the execution itself. Germany is the primary source of information on this type of sword, as they were widely used within its judicial system, and numerous documents on the subject have survived to the present day.The crossguard, made of iron and cruciform in shape, is in fair condition for a weapon that has seen so much use. The hilt is the original wood; this is a rare feature, as most hilts have been replaced over time.The blade, sturdy and double-edged, features the characteristic flattened tip; it bears significant signs of wear in several areas.Specifications:Total length of the sword: 114 cm
