Description

A charming 18th-century carved walnut putto, depicted in a lively pose, with one hand brought up to his chest, holding a drape that falls from his shoulder and wraps around his hips.The face, with its full cheeks framed by curly hair, has a gentle expression and slightly parted lips. The generous proportions of the body and the movement of the drapery give this sculpture a beautiful decorative presence.The lowered hand appears to have once held an attribute that is now missing. This sculpted piece likely originated from a decorative or religious ensemble, perhaps an altarpiece.The walnut wood has a brown patina with warm tones, highlighting the contours of the face and the flesh.Presented in its fragmentary state: missing sections, particularly at the extremities and in the drapery, as well as
