Description

Description :This small 19th-century copper cauldron has a subtly waisted body that curves outward toward the base. A broad rolled rim defines the circular opening and catches the light along its edge. Visible hammer marks give the copper a gently uneven texture, with warm reddish highlights and deeper brown tones across the surface. The simple shape of the vessel draws attention to its more elaborate iron handle.The wrought iron swing handle forms a broad arch with open scrolls at each end. It pivots through two oval mounts secured to the copper body with visible rivets. When raised, the handle gives the piece a taller silhouette. When lowered, it follows the curve of the rim, leaving the hammered sides in full view.The copper shows scratches, small dents, and areas of oxidation, particularly around
