Description

A ceramic bowl or centerpiece in the glazed majolica slip-cast style from the late Art Nouveau period. It is a beautifully crafted piece with organic, dynamic forms. The ceramic is richly decorated with sculpted, raised flowers painted in a trompe-l'oeil style (notably white and pink anemones and wild roses) as well as textured green foliage. The piece also features a handle or decorative element--a small, sculpted dragon in a fantastical or naturalistic style--coiled around the piece. The primary colors blend a chocolate-brown background with mottled caramel tones, contrasting with the vibrancy of the flowers and leaves glazed in green and white. The base bears a signature and/or a hand-painted mark beneath the glazed background, likely from the pottery studio.
