Description

A magnificent terracotta oil jar known as a "pithari" in Greece. This piece has been in Normandy for nearly 40 years; it was simply displayed in a park as a decorative ornament.A true work of art, this imposing terracotta piece captivates us with its sculptural and organic character. Its generous silhouette evokes a natural form shaped by time, halfway between the mineral and the plant kingdom.The thick concentric ridges that punctuate its surface create a powerful three-dimensional effect, reminiscent of geological strata or growth rings.The raw texture of the clay reinforces this impression of an almost primitive and archaic piece.With its proportions and presence, this pottery transcends its utilitarian function to assert itself as a true architectural piece, perfectly suited to a
