Description

This model follows in the tradition of the great allegorical figures of the Renaissance (such as Antoine Coysevox's Renommée or Giambologna's Flying Mercury, in terms of balance on a sphere and airy momentum), reinterpreted with the vibrant naturalism and supple modeling characteristic of the late 19th-century Belgian school.This bronze is a period edition (late 19th-early 20th century), likely produced by one of the major Brussels foundries with which Dillens collaborated closely (such as the Compagnie des Bronzes de Bruxelles, Verbeyst, or Petermann), although no foundry mark is visible on the photographs provided. The junction between the central piece and the wings of this sculpture is visible. The sculpture dates from the late 19th century.
