Description

This silver-plated brass sprinkler, dating from the late 18th to early 19th century, is characterized by a long, faceted handle with a ring at the top and a pinecone-shaped head. The lower end features embossed work imitating the scales of a pinecone, with small holes to allow water to flow out. The elongated handle has a polygonal cross-section divided by two knots. The structure is made of brass with a silver plating that has worn away over time, revealing the underlying metal in some places.
