Description

Large oil-on-canvas painting from the Louis XIV period, depicting Odysseus' discovery of Astyanax, hidden in the tomb of his father, Hector.This dramatic scene depicts the discovery of the young Astyanax, son of Hector, hidden in his father's tomb after the fall of Troy. The Greek hero Odysseus is shown pointing at the child, while soldiers prepare to drag him from his hiding place. The composition is marked by intense dramatic tension: expressive gestures, gazes fixed on the child, and contrasts between movement and stillness. The women, in particular, embody pain and supplication in the face of imminent violence.Note: Oil on its original canvas; wear in the paint layer consistent with the painting's age.The frame is from the 19th century.Shipping within France in a wooden
