Description

Wooden model of the hull of the Cygne, a brig of the French Navy during the First Empire, built in 1806. The hull is planked only on the upper portion, revealing the shape of each rib as well as the various structural components. Some wooden structural elements are visible on the upper deck, where the locations of the two masts can be seen..."This vessel is one of the most representative examples of the French Navy's so-called '24' brigs (named for the caliber of the carronades in the main armament), of which about sixty were built between 1801 and 1813."
