landscapes and seascapes.

Adopted French and infinitely sensitive to light, he peingnit under all the skies of France, especially in Normandy and in the south west.

Fixed in Paris, he owes to him important canvases in which, softening his predominantly gilded palette, he returned in the last years to more serious harmonies, and passionately painted

Notre Dame and old Paris.

His mailings to the independents and the main annual salons of Paris and province increased his fame.

Associate of the National Fine Arts, he exhibited large ensembles in Paris, Basel and especially London, he had to retain his personality, without allowing himself to be subordinated by any movement.
