ostentatious symbols of status in aristocracy and the wealthy Russian merchant class. The demand for lacquered items explodes. Just five years after Lukutin took over the workshop, he employed more than fifty qualified painters, and a school inside the factory trained apprentices. Pyotr Lukutin began exhibiting his products in 1828 at industrial fairs and craft in Russia and Europe, winning great success with the public and numerous awards. It was that same year that Lukutin received the highest honor, a royal edict, allowing him to use the imperial emblem (double-headed eagle and his initials) as the company's trademark. Alexander Lukutin joined his father as director of the factory in 1841, and together they translated a simple trade into an authentic art form thanks to the innovation which he demonstrated in the decorations and techniques. The Lukutin workshop closed its doors definitively in 1904 and some of its artists were transferred to the Vishnyakov workshop.
