recovered from his mental illness. He exhibited in Paris in 1960.
He was already painting the typical landscapes of the Butte: Lapin à Gill, Moulin de la Galette, Maison de Mimi Pinson before Utrillo also took them as themes. After the First World War, his views of Paris brought him rapid success, which his sensitivity there retained.
Around 1920, a rich amateur gave him the means for a long stay in the South, from where he brought back landscapes whose wonder at the Mediterranean nature that they translated sometimes evoked the name of Matisse.
