Description

Rare wooden Buddha in his temple, probably from Elm. The richly decorated temple is set on a wooden stele. On either side of the opening, two dragons fly and protect the representation of the earth. The roof is shaped like a pagoda and is topped with a lotus-flowered stupa. We can notice remnants of polychromy of red and green colors, as well as gilding. The Buddha is seated there in a meditation position in front of his Mandorle, his hands in Namaste Mudra. Have seen remains of polychromy and gilding with gold leaf. We find here a beautiful work of popular style certainly, but undoubtedly of very good taste. The shape of the roof is typical of Mongolian temples. Tibetan Buddhism remains the religion of 90% of Mongolians. Kubilai Khan, who was more versed in Chan Buddhism in his
