The patina is superb and the object has a magnificent decoration on the entire body as well as a beautiful frieze around the neck and the cap. Bidri is specific to the Indian world. This zinc-based alloy (at least 87%) of lead, copper and tin appeared in the 17th century in Bîdâr. It is the only alloy whose base is not copper. The objects are cast, polished, and then rubbed with copper sulfate, which blackens the metal.

Silver and brass inlays, more rarely gold, are then added to it: they can be "flush" or in relief on a layer of lead (a specialty of the town of Lucknow). Then the craftsman applies a paste composed of ammonium chloride, potassium nitrate and sodium chloride, which only blackens the alloy.

The object is washed, then rubbed with oil, which further accentuates the depth of black or bronze green.
