Description

Important painting representing a Flemish fair. This village festival highlights peasants seated at tables, partying and dancing in a small village. The background of the painting is occupied by the villagers celebrating. The foreground is reserved for notables who, riders, pedestrians or leaving the coach, seem to pose for the painting. The representations of village festivals and fairs appear with Dürer. The Flemish painters fully appropriate these genre scenes and it is Bruegel the elder who will put this style of paintings in fashion, followed by many talented painters. Through these paintings, they manage to transport us around, and success comes in particular through the festive character deployed but also by the number of details teeming in these paintings. Here, a peasant is busy drawing water (bottom
