n claws and it is a fawn muzzle carried by a long curved neck forming a carved carvet of palm leaves which constitutes the crook of the armrest. (ill. page 186, the French furniture of Guillaume Jeanneau). Back legs in Etruscan sabre. This seat is almost certainly attributable to JACOB FRERES, RUE MESLEE (1796-1803). The two sons of Georges Jacob (1735-1814) that is to say George II (1769-1803) and François Honoré (1770-1841) joined forces in 1796 to take over their father's workshop under the company name "Jacob Frères, rue Meslée). Given their success, Georges interrupted his retirement to help his son supply furniture for the imperial residences of Napoleon I. The eldest of the Jacob brothers died prematurely on 30 Vendémiaire Year XII (October 23, 1803) and François-Honoré formed
