Percier, Alphonse Jacob created works of a very sought-after composition taking care of the ornamental decoration. Unfortunately, the tastes of his time and the principles of economics which prevailed forced him to decline thereafter in industrial practice. In 1847, discouraged at not being able to fight against the decline of his art, he ceded his establishments to his colleague J. Jeanselme. His productions present different stamps, with or without a framed star. Late in life, he adopted that of his grandfather from which he had removed the initial of the first name.
