These large Louis XIV style feet therefore represent a lion's paw adorned with a coat of arms ring. A woman with a bare chest and a stole stands out in front of a canopy with intricate volutes, each woman looking in the opposite direction. These elements belonged to consoles or woodwork, they are too high to have been those of a table.

The design of these feet is close to that of similar elements from the beginning of the 18th century.

Indeed because there are two pairs that I sell separately. Large bronze elements are particularly rare because, unlike complete movable objects, these pieces mostly disappeared in the furnaces of metal salvagers. A cornice behind the canopy which carried the console top will allow them to be re-used as a console or as spectacular lamp bases. A made-to-measure steel plinth was also made to display them as sculptures.
