pottery first developed by Josiah Wedgwood in the 1770s. Usually described as stoneware, it has an unglazed "biscuit" matte finish and is produced in a number of different colors , the most common and well-known of which is a pale blue that has come to be known as Wedgwood Blue. Embossed decorations in contrasting colors (usually in white but also in other colors) are characteristic of jasperware, giving a cameo effect. The reliefs are produced in molds and applied to the articles in the form of strands.
